No one in the village remembers if ever a peacock was harmed in Chincholi Morachi. The only instance that a few villagers can recall happened almost 25-30 years ago, when a boy from neighboring village, who had come as a part of a marriage party, threw a stone at a peacock and injured it. The peacock died soon after. The incensed villagers filed a case with the district administration against the boy's family. Only when the boy's family apologized saying that the boy was a minor, were matters sorted out, says P.S. Metha, the Principal of the local school. The peacocks too have repaid the villagers in their own way. Not only do they help in keeping snakes at bay, they also act as a natural biological contract by eating the insects on the crops.

In addition, the village has now become soothing of a tourist attraction, thanks to the peacocks. Last year, for instance, the Maharashtra tourism department gave Chincholi Morachi the status of tourist village work has been completed on a tourist bungalow already, say villagers, there have been a few tourist from abroad. People from nearby areas, especially school children, are regular visitors too.
